At the last conclave of Manhattan Commandery, Knights Templar, No. 81, Eminent Sir Joseph A. Britton was surprised upon re-tiring from the honorable position of Emi-nent-Commander with a presentation from the members of the commandery.

SEminent Commander Raymond, in a neat little speech, handed to Knight Britton an elaborate gold and red enamelled cross. Nestling in the centre of a white enamel Maltese cross was a two-carst diamond, and on the ribbon and gold pins were a cross and grown and the name of the commandery.

On the obverse side was the inscription "Presented to Eminent Sir Joseph A. Britton by the Sir Knights of Manhattan Commandery, K. T., No. 31, New York City, as a token of their esteem for him as a man and a brother, Sept. 12, 1888," Eminent Sir Britton responded feelingly as soon as he recovered from the great surprise.

FROM THE CITY'S WHIRL

DRIFT CAUGHT BERE AND THERE BY "EVENING WORLD" REPORTERS.

This Man Was Not Always a " Sometimes" Caterer.

People who frequent Exchange place, the vicinity of New street, cannot have failed to have observed an old negro, dressed in an exaggerated costume, with a great crowd of urchins gathered about him.

He is a queer old chap. His broad expanse of bosom is covered with a clean, white apron, and perched on his head a large, fourcornered baker's cap, made of white linen.

He comes down about 10 o'clock every norning. In one hand is a big tin boiler full of coffee, while the other holds a basket of food of a more solid nature. Attached to the basket is a sign which ******************************

Here I come again! ALL KINDS OF SANDWICHES. PIE AND CAKE. CHICKEN AND TURKEY,

The "Sometimes" is in very small letters. After he had fed the multitude of small boys down there, he removes to Newspaper Row, and, joining his wife, who runs a lemonade and cake stand in front of the Franklin statue, they get their "fine work" in on the stemachs of the newsboys.

This old man conducts his business something similar to Mrs. Lamadrid, of the St. Andrew's Kitchens, by selling his "feed" at one cent. But there the similarity ends, for while Mrs. L. sells cheaply as an act of phi-

Sixth avenue.

It is said that the old man was then in the habit of wearing his patrons' best white linen shirts, and that during the cheerless blasts of winter he would carry enough underwear to "sweat a cold."

But he was always good-natured, and when a customer "kicked" against his thought-lessness in not providing a clean shirt for Sunday, he always had a jolly remark ready to ease his patron's wrath.

Brooklyn Bridge to Figure on a Big Piece of Cauvas.

Passing by the door of a studio in the Sherwood, the attention of an Evening World man was caught by an enormous frame covered with canvas. The back was towards the door, so what was painted on the canvas could not be seen. But the size of it was sufficient to rivet attention. It was larger than Rosa Bonheur's picture of "The Horse Fair," at the Metropolitan. Tapping on the door two or three times the Tapping on the door two or three times the newspaper man received no answer, those within were so interested in their work; so he stepped into the studio and around the end of the large canvas. A tall, stout man, with a bushy beard, was standing in front of the picture, and at a little distance was the artist's assistant, examining a photograph. The artist was M. Emit Renour, whose pictures have excited a good deal of interest in New York art circles and in America generally.

May I take a look at your painting, M. Renouf?" asked the visitor.
"Certainly," answered the genial Frenchman.

The subject was the Brooklyn Bridge. The picture was entirely laid in and the general color scheme was indicated, but much remained to be done before the work is commained to be done before the work is completely finished. One end of the bridge recedes away from the spectator and the structure stands out against a rich sunset sky, of the most brilliant coloring.

The picture will be hung in the Eden Musee, when it is done, and probably will excite more interest than any picture which has been exhibited there.

It is a picture which calls for much skill, especially when carried out on such a huge scale. M. Renouf has made numerous studies of the bridge, and has several photographs of it from different points.

The Wedding Ring Grew Tight in Spite of Its Pleasant Memories.

Travelling on a Third avenue surface car one morning the attention of an Evening World observer was attracted to a man who

The man noticed the eye of the reporter fixed on that mark, and, smiling, he held out his hand and turned around the ring. On the side which had been underneath the ring was a diagonal cut through the ring about as wide as the file-blade of a penknife is thick.

"I had to have the ring filed off the finger this morning," the man said. "It had got so tight that it hurt me too much to wear it on that finger. I couldn't get it off, so the jeweler filed through it and pulled it off that way. He scratched me a little bit."

He gave the ring a little twist on his ninger, and just then the newspaper man had to get off, leaving him eyeing it with a look of pleasant memories awakened by the sight of the simple hoop of gold.

"Lucky man, to whom his wedding ring brings feelings of delight seven years after," said the reporter to himself.

On these occasions the bill generally consisted of a Mitchell and Dempsey together, why would drama and a farce. Ted McVicker would play the old men, and Reed the young men. "My child! My lost Lena!"
When, at length, she related her story, no doubt was left in the mind of either or the delighted parents that she was their missing child.

child.

She was known, she said, by the name of Florence Hopeton, and her earliest recollections were of her father—or one whom she had supposed to be her father.

He was killed in attempting to alight from a steam-car while in motion. Mark Hopeton's last word had been:

"Tell Florence she is not my child."

He had tried to say more, but died with the words unspoken.

Having waited a short time for the soporific vapor to take effect, he carefully entered the apartment, and bore the little one from her mother's bedside without disturbing her deep repose.

Mrs. Elwood was the first to recover consciousness, at a late hour the following morning, and the first object on which her gaze rested was the empty crib.

Then looking down and blacking deeply, she added: "I do not exactly kno, sir."

After a few moments' conversation the girl was persuaded to accompany Mr. and Mrs. Elwood to their hotel, where wisting one of the cities of the far west, hoping to benefit thereby the health ing, and the first object on which her gaze rested was the empty crib.

Florence Hartly was the petted, only daughter of a wealthy merchant, who could see no fault in anything she did, whatever others might think of her conduct.

She little understood the man she had conquered and she expected to discard him as easily as she had others, but when she was forced to listen to his impassioned expressions of love—and then, when he discovered himself to have been the dupe of her designs, to his threatened vengeance—her cowardly heart was indeed frightened into repentance for her reprehensible conduct.

Five years went by, and in the cosy sittingroom of a handsome cottage, situated in the suburbs of the city of B—--, a young mother sat in a low chair, singing soft, sweet lulla-bys to the little one she clasped so fondly in

When the time came for retiring Mrs. El-wood carried her little one up stars and placed her in the crib that stood close by her bedside, for she had never allowed her to be removed from her a single night since her birth. When the night was far advanced and the whole household was wrapped in siumber, the dark form of a man cautiously ascended by means of a rope-ladder to the balcony. Having unfastened tine window by insert-ing his hand through an aperture from which he had removed a pane of glass, he noiselessly
